All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy. Especially when that work is a low-paying job at the local supermarket and Jack has a business degree.

With a little help from a customer, Jack develops a spur of the moment business plan. His business will take him right into peoples' homes. Doing deliveries is still a service job, but when his customers want more than their groceries delivered, the types of service he provides widen dramatically.

Jack finds that his first customer, the lady whose comment sparked the idea for his business, wants him to deliver pleasure and satisfaction as well as her groceries. After his performance, she's willing to recommend his services to quite a few of her friends, ones whose requests will keep Jack hopping and provide satisfaction to both him and the women he services.
